

“The Iraqi prison scandal has ignited the entire Middle East!

James DiGeorgia, Editor

Pro-U.S. governments are ready to fall...and Islamic radicals are waiting to take over!

“The days of cheap oil are almost gone. Get ready for an explosion in oil prices—and a devastating economic crash!”

- Muslims flock to Osama bin Laden—a new wave of terrorist attacks is coming
- The coming attacks on Saudi oil fields
- What you MUST do to prepare now

Rage against the U.S. is sweeping across the Middle East. Shocking photos of Iraqi prison atrocities have infuriated millions of Muslims.

Torture, rape, sexual humiliation, even murder—all going on for months, as we’re now finding out. Even the Israeli/Arab conflict, which has been raging bitterly for decades, never produced anything like this.

This might be the most important investment message you’ll ever read. Oil prices are going to explode, far beyond their already high levels—and you’d better be prepared for the economic firestorm that’s coming.

Sky-high oil prices will devastate our modern economy, far beyond steep gas prices at the pump. Oil is used to make fuels, lubricants, fertilizers, plastics, and countless other things. How many things do you use every day that are made from plastic? How many things did you buy this week that were shipped to the store by a diesel-powered truck? How much of your food was grown using petroleum-based fertilizers... harvested by diesel-powered combines... and shipped to you on a diesel-powered train?

Oil is the glue holding our society together. The Middle East crisis will affect all of your investments—not only oil, but also stocks, bonds, precious metals, the works.

How can war crimes in an Iraqi prison affect us here at home? In many ways, actually, but the one I'm going to focus on in this issue is...

Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia is our closest ally in the Middle East—the royal family has always been very pro-American. Unlike many other oil-producing countries, the Saudis are happy to prop up our economy by keeping oil prices cheap.

Since the 1960's, the royal House of Saud has made it a point to ingratiate themselves with American political leaders. Presidents, Senators, Congressional lawmakers and aides, Cabinet members... all have been befriended by the Saudis. Prince Bandar, the Saudi ambassador to the U.S., is so close to the Bush family that Barbara Bush (the President's mother and former First Lady) has even called him "Bandar Bush"!

But underneath all this, there's an ugly truth that's been suppressed. Saudi Arabia is one of the world's most brutal dictatorships. Thanks to the prison photos, its already restless population is now aflame with hatred of the U.S.... and the corrupt Saudi government that's allied with us.

Here's the story the American media isn't telling you...

Torture, amputations, and public executions

That's what life is like under the government of Saudi Arabia.

There are no rights in Saudi Arabia. No freedom of speech, religion, or anything else. People aren't citizens—they're subjects. Take a look at a Saudi passport: it says the holder "belongs" to the royal family. People are as much the property of the royal House of Saud as are their private jets, palaces, and Rolls-Royces.

The al-Saud family has been a group of vicious thugs from the beginning. Before Ibn Saud completed his conquest of the Arabian peninsula in 1932, al-Saud fought a series of wars against other tribes. Between 1918 and 1928, they massacred many enemy tribes, often after accepting their surrender. Men, women, and children—all were slain. They also enforced a brutal version of Islamic law—a poor person caught stealing bread would have his arm amputated. For many other crimes, the punishment was to be publicly beheaded—often done personally by a member of the al-Saud family.

By the time Arabia was subdued, there had been 40,000 public executions and 350,000 amputations. This in a country of only 4 million people.

Since then, the savage nature of the al-Saud family hasn't changed. Anybody who criticizes the regime is kidnapped and murdered, or else publicly executed. Saudi Arabia leads the world in public beheadings—the favored spot is a plaza in Riyadh known as Chop-Chop Square.

Even citizens of other countries aren't safe. William Sampson, a Canadian pharmaceutical engineer who worked in Saudi Arabia, was kidnapped and tortured continuously by police until he finally “confessed” to a terrorist bombing. Canadian diplomats barely prevented a beheading.

Extravagance and corruption

As you can guess, absolute power has completely corrupted the House of Saud. Untold billions of dollars from Arabian oil have made the sheikhs famous worldwide for their extravagant lifestyles.

King Fahd, the current ruler, has married 100 women, and lives in a palace that cost $3 billion. Fahd's lavishness is legendary: he once lost $8 million in one night of gambling in Monte Carlo. Before his stroke in 1995, he used to travel around the world on private holidays—taking 8 aircraft (including 5 Boeing 747s), 400 retainers, 200 tons of luggage, and 25 Rolls-Royces and limos.

When the royal family visits their palace in Marbella, Spain, they spend an average of $5 million per day in local stores—so much that the local merchants want to name a street after them. Saudi princes lounge in their monstrous yachts on the French Riviera... enjoy the cool breezes at their private palaces in Morocco... pamper themselves in their penthouses in London, New York, and Paris... and the list goes on.

The House of Saud has 30,000 princes and princesses. Each prince expects a monthly allowance of at least $260,000. And thanks to the constant skirt-chasing of the princes, the number of royals will double in the next generation

The extravagant lifestyles of the princes leave them with a constant lust for more cash. Corruption is rampant: royals skim money and take bribes on everything they can get their fingers into, such as construction projects, arms deals, and foreign visas. Some even bootleg liquor and narcotics (although Islam forbids both).

Theft from non-royal subjects is rampant: a common practice is for a prince to eat in a restaurant, and decide he likes the place...then call over the owner and write out a check to buy it (for far less than the place is worth). The owner can either accept it, or refuse: if he refuses, his property will be seized anyway, and if he's really unlucky he'll be arrested later for a trumped-up charge like “sorcery” (which is punishable by beheading).

King Fahd's favorite son Abdul Aziz bin Fahd (known as Azouzi, or “dearie”) built a palace for himself outside of Riyadh. It cost a mere $4.6 billion—to enter you have to walk through four separate arched gates. It includes a scale model of old Mecca, complete with actors attending mosque and chanting prayers 24 hours per day. And, true to form for the royals, the land it's built upon was seized from his “subjects.”

Unemployment and unrest

With 30,000 parasites sucking out untold billions of dollars each year, the Saudi economy is on the brink of collapse. Annual per capita income is down to a mere $8,030.

Unemployment is a staggering 30%. Plus, half of the population is under 18 (Saudi Arabia has one of the highest birth rates in the world: 37.25 births per thousand). And nothing is more dangerous to a despotic government than large numbers of young people with nothing to do...

The educational system hasn't helped. Most Saudi youth aren't taught any worthwhile skills—they spend most of their time studying Wahhabi Islam, a radical form of the Muslim religion. (2 out of 3 doctorates awarded in Saudi Arabia are in Islamic studies.) A former diplomat who served in Riyadh told Time magazine: “Something unexpected happened. Instead of this wonderful utopia, where young men were attracted to academia to learn about Islam, you got thousands of religious graduates who couldn't find jobs.”

So there are large numbers of unemployed young people, steeped in militant Islam, and living under a brutal regime. That regime is blatantly and disgustingly corrupt... and the youth have nothing to do but brood about the problem. From the government's perspective, this is a recipe for disaster...

The House of Saud is ready to fall... and a fanatic Islamic (and anti-U.S.) government will take its place.

American media don't tell us what the Saudi people are really like. Since the Saudi rulers are our "friends," and sell us cheap oil, that's all we need to know, right?

Wrong! Except for the royal family, Saudi Arabia is a seething mass of radical Wahhabi Islam. Even before we invaded Iraq last year, the Saudi people hated us.

Loudspeakers in the mosques screech about the corrupt West, especially the United States. Clerics scream murderous rants against all non-Muslim countries, and glorify suicide bombers around the world. Government-funded madrassas (militant Islamic schools) teach that Allah will turn all Christians and Jews into apes and pigs.

Saudis give money to violent Islamic movements across the Middle East, Africa, and Asia. Even Saudi-funded Islamic "charities" here in the U.S. breathe venom in their sermons against the West, and after 9/11, FBI raids proved that many of these "charities" were actually funneling money to terrorists.

The Saudis embrace those that even the other Muslim countries reject—like the Muslim Brotherhood. This bloodthirsty group of fanatic terrorists has been thrown out of almost every other Islamic country they've infiltrated.

For example, in February 1982 the Muslim Brotherhood seized Hama, Syria's fourth largest city. Syria is a Muslim country that supports many Islamic terrorist groups—but rather than give in to the vicious Brotherhood, Syrian leader Hafiz al-Asad called out the army and destroyed the entire city with the Brotherhood members (and the city's population) still inside. He left it a smoldering pile of rubble.

Yet Saudi Arabia supports the Brotherhood. For example, Abdallah Azzam, "the Amir of jihad" in the Brotherhood, teaches at a Saudi university.

Osama bin Laden is himself a Saudi, and a hero within his home country...

A few days after 9/11, while bodies were still being pulled from the ruins of the World Trade Center, a poll showed that 95% of educated Saudis support Osama bin Laden.

In the summer of 2002, almost 4 of every 5 hits on a clandestine al-Qaeda website came from inside Saudi Arabia. And let's not forget that of the 19 hijackers on 9/11, 15 of them were Saudis!

By the way, recent news reports say that al-Qaeda's recruiting is exploding. For a while, they weren't doing too well: we destroyed their support structure in Afghanistan and killed many of the leaders. But now, thanks to the prison atrocities, young Muslim men are lining up in droves to go get some payback. Most will go to Iraq and attack our troops, making it even more of a quagmire than it already is. Some, however, are preparing for new attacks within the U.S. itself, as the FBI warned in a bulletin last week.

The jaw-dropping thing about the prison photographs is...

The pictures couldn't be better at enraging Muslims than if Osama himself had staged them!

At the core of Wahhabi Islam is a complete, utter mastery of men over women. We all heard stories about the Taliban, but it's just as bad in Saudi Arabia.

Women can't drive or conduct business without a man doing it for them. Nor can they appear in public unless they're completely covered, head to toe. It's also illegal for a man to talk to an unmarried woman (unless they're related). Many women are illiterate: the few women that actually go to college aren't allowed to attend lectures given by male professors.

The muttawa (religious police) roam the streets, beating women on their arms and legs if their robes are too short. In March 2002, when a girl's school caught fire, some members of the muttawa blocked its exits to prevent the girls from escaping, because the girls weren't properly covered. 14 girls died, many others were horribly burned.

The Arab Middle East is dedicated to this "moral purity," to the point of hysteria. A few years ago, Egyptian newspapers accused Israel of selling chewing gum to Arab women that was laced with sexual hormones, to turn them all into prostitutes. Palestinian officials also confirmed this "Zionist plot" (and also said it would somehow "completely destroy the genetic systems of young boys").

Imagine then the effect of pictures showing naked, humiliated Arab men, while a grinning American woman points to their genitals and gives a thumbs-up. Or a man being dragged around on a leash by the same woman. Or a bound man with a pair of woman's panties on his head. Or men forced to perform sexual acts on each other.

These pictures confirm the worst fire-breathing accusations of Wahhabi clerics and al-Qaeda websites: that America has come not to save the Iraqi people from tyranny, but to defile and corrupt pure Islamic countries and turn them into a "moral sewer" like America itself.

And we haven't even seen the worst pictures yet. Donald Rumsfeld gave a confidential briefing to Congress a week ago, showing them pictures that haven't been released...pictures that contain "far worse" than what we've seen so far, including rape and murder. Even a video of an Iraqi prisoner, smashing his own head against the wall... trying desperately to knock himself out and avoid further abuse.

Now Arab television broadcasts pictures of Americans torturing and humiliating Muslim prisoners... al-Qaeda websites contain pictures of dead children, supposedly killed by our troops... and there are apparently even photos of American troops gang-raping Iraqi women, holding guns to their heads. (By the way, those last photos are fake, staged by "actors" for a pornographic website. But the Arab media published them anyway—and why not, seeing as the Boston Globe did too last week?)

The Arab world has now exploded in hatred and rage against the U.S. Any government that's even remotely pro-Western is under siege from its own people... and that includes the Saudis, the most friendly to the U.S. of all the Arab nations.

The House of Saud was already in trouble—now it's teetering on the cliff's edge, pinwheeling its arms...

The royal family is falling apart. King Fahd was incapacitated by a stroke in 1995, and rumor has it he's little more than a vegetable at this point. But, they keep him breathing on life support hoping he'll outlive his brother, Crown Prince Abdallah, who'll take the throne if Fahd dies. Abdallah is hated by others in the royal family, since he openly condemns the extravagance and corruption of the other princes, and none of them want to see him become king. So they're keeping Fahd alive as long as possible. Since both Fahd and Abdallah are in their 80's, it's anybody's guess who'll be buried first.

Meanwhile, Fahd's favorite wife Al-Jawhara and her son Azouzi are apparently ruling the country. But not very tightly, since neither of them technically have any authority to do so. So, the rest of the princes are running wild, stealing everything they can while they can.

The hated and corrupt royal family is now leaderless, and weak. Meanwhile, the entire country's a forest fire of anger and hatred, raging out of control against the U.S. So now, many intelligence analysts are waiting for...

Terrorist attacks on Saudi oil fields

Saudi Arabia has one-quarter of the world's oil... and it's shockingly vulnerable.

The U.S. is completely dependent upon cheap oil from Saudi Arabia. We haven't built a refinery of our own for 28 years, and our oil production has steadily declined since 1970. So, the U.S. government has studied how vulnerable the Saudi oil fields would be to a terrorist attack. The conclusions are frightening...

Half of the country's reserves (12.5% of all known oil in the world) are in only 8 oil fields. These fields are gargantuan: for example, Ghawar is the world's largest onshore oil field, and Safaniya is the largest offshore field. (Ghawar alone has 87 billion barrels of oil.)

These facilities, and their hundreds of miles of pipelines stretching across the uninhabited desert, have countless vulnerable points. If terrorists hit only 5 of the many sensitive points in the system, Saudi Arabia could be knocked out of the oil business for up to 2 years.

For example, the Saudis have a huge refining facility at Abqaiq, producing 6.8 million barrels per day. With huge tanks of flammable (and poisonous) hydrogen sulfide, intelligence analysts have identified Abqaiq as an easy target for terrorists. Even a moderately successful attack here would cripple the facility, bringing production down to 1 million barrels daily for 2 months. This loss is equivalent to 1/4th of the entire U.S. daily consumption of oil. Up to 7 months later, output would only be up to 40%—4 million barrels below normal.

Or, the terrorists could target the Ju'aymah terminal. It has a metering platform more than 6 miles offshore, with 4 underwater pipelines feeding mooring buoys. On average, 4.3 million barrels of oil per day are transferred to tankers at Ju'aymah. An attack here could cut the processing in half for months. All it would take is a small boat, a couple hundred pounds of plastic explosive, and a crewman who wants to go meet Allah.

Keep in mind that the 1970's OPEC oil embargo removed only 3 million barrels per day from world markets, but inflation in the U.S. still soared to 11 percent, and the S&P 500 lost 47% of its value in 21 months.

Nevertheless, there are some skeptics who aren't worried about the loss of Saudi oil. They point out that Saudi Arabia supplies only 8% of the oil consumed in the United States. That's true, but they ignore the catastrophic effect on world markets that a terrorist attack would have. Taking a large amount of Saudi oil off the market would make oil prices skyrocket around the globe.

Saudi Arabia has 25% of the world's proven reserves, and it's the cheapest oil in the world to extract. The country has half the world's surplus production capacity, which provides stability and liquidity to world markets. For example, the day after 9/11, the Saudis put an extra 9 million barrels of oil on the market, to prevent a huge price spike.

Analysts say that a terrorist attack on Saudi oil would make oil explode to $80 or $90 a barrel overnight. That's not even counting speculative buying, which would push the price higher... and if chaos in Saudi Arabia spilled over into the surrounding Muslim countries, now we're talking about 60% of the oil in the entire world being affected.

Osama bin Laden has publicly said that oil should be at $144 per barrel—more than $100 above the current price.

This would not only make Muslims a lot more money, but would cripple the U.S. economy as well. That's an ideal combination in Osama's eyes. And there's little doubt that a few attacks by al-Qaeda would get the price to that level.

Plus, Osama bin Laden has openly called for the overthrow of the Saudi royals, to remove their "defilement" from holy Muslim territory. Taking out a few oil fields and cutting off their income would be a good way to do it.

But when will this happen?

Terrorists have been ramping up attacks in Saudi Arabia and other Muslim countries for a while now, but the U.S. media usually ignore it. Just in the last few weeks, several gunmen with assault rifles opened fire in the Saudi port of Yanbu, attacking the offices of an oil company...Jordanian officials narrowly averted an al-Qaeda chemical weapons attack...and the U.S. Navy shot up two terrorist boats that were trying to blow up Iraq's Bosra oil export terminal.

Right now, the American public would rather read about the latest celebrity gossip than hear about the truck bombings in the Saudi capital of Riyadh. I think that's going to change: the attacks over there are going to have a dramatic impact on our lives, much more so than anybody can imagine.

Some analysts are surprised that bin Laden hasn't made his move already. I think he's been waiting for something. And here's where the story gets interesting...

Are Saudi royals in bed with Osama bin Laden?

On March 29, 2002, an al-Qaeda terrorist named Abu Zubaydah was captured in Pakistan by U.S. and Pakistani forces. Zubaydah was the chief of operations for the suicide attack on the U.S.S. Cole (the U.S. Navy destroyer that had a hole blown in its side by a rubber boat full of explosives. Four of our sailors died).

Zubaydah was shot three times during his arrest, but our doctors patched him up. During his recovery, we slipped Sodium Pentothal into his I.V. drip, and then questioned him. Two teams of interrogators were assigned: one that was obviously American, and another made up of Americans who pretended to be Saudis. The idea was to scare him into confessing to the American team, since the Saudis are famous for using torture on their prisoners.

To avoid falling into hands of the "Saudis," we figured that Zubaydah would try to ingratiate himself with the American team. But that's not what happened...

Zubaydah wasn't scared of the "Saudis": he was relieved to see them. He told them to call Prince Ahmed bin Salman, a senior member of the royal family, and quoted correct phone numbers from memory—Ahmed would "tell you what to do," he told his inquisitors. Zubaydah said that Ahmed had made a deal with al-Qaeda: the Saudi royals would fund al-Qaeda, in exchange for al-Qaeda not attacking inside Saudi Arabia. Zubaydah also mentioned Prince Sultan bin Faisal and Prince Fahd bin Turki as being part of the plan.

Zubaydah even claimed that Prince Ahmed knew about 9/11 before it happened, but couldn't warn the U.S. because he didn't know exactly what would happen or where. And, he added, the Saudis can't turn their backs on bin Laden now, because he can show that they had prior knowledge of 9/11. (Afterwards, when Zubaydah finally realized that his "Saudi" interrogators were actually Americans, he tried to strangle himself.)

The U.S. was stunned to learn all this. The Saudis of course deny everything. And there's no way to find out the truth, because...

Shortly afterwards (on July 22), Prince Ahmed died of a "heart attack." The next day, Prince Sultan died in a one-car crash, while driving to Ahmed's funeral. Then, a few days later on July 30, Prince Fahd was found in the desert, having "died of thirst." (What was a member of the royal family doing out in the desert, alone, and without any water?)

Coincidence? Maybe...but I doubt it. (By the way, Zubaydah also mentioned Pakistani minister Mushaf Ali Mir as being part of the arrangement. He died in a plane crash a few months later. Sabotage was suspected.)

I think that some of the Saudi royals are stalling for time. They've bought off al-Qaeda for now, hoping that when King Fahd finally dies, they'll be the ones in power...and will institute anti-U.S. policies to keep Osama happy. Heck, Fahd's favorite son Azouzi openly gave the Taliban $100 million a few years back. A direct agreement with al-Qaeda wouldn't surprise me.

Of course, there's no guarantee that this part of the royal family will win control. There are at least 5 main factions within the family, all jockeying for power...and it's anybody's bet who will win the kingdom. That's assuming anybody wins at all: a long, bloody civil war is very possible, especially since the royals maintain two separate armies (to prevent a military coup—the other one can put the rebellion down. But what if the royals use the armies to attack each other?)

So here's what we're facing. Every day, Saudi Arabia gets more unstable. King Fahd is still breathing, but just barely. His successor, Crown Prince Abdallah, is also in his 80's and could go at any time. Once both are dead, there are several factions within the family who will fight for the throne, at least some of which are allied with al-Qaeda.

If a pro-al Qaeda faction takes control, the U.S. can kiss cheap oil goodbye. Osama's desire for $144 per barrel will be implemented immediately.

If somebody else takes over, cheap oil will still be just a memory. If al-Qaeda itself doesn't decide to attack, another group will. As CIA Director George Tenet recently said, "Al-Qaeda has infected others with its theology. Other extremist groups within the movement it influenced have become the next wave of the terrorist threat." Whether or not Osama made a bargain with some of the royals won't matter to these other terrorist groups.

Of course, the royal family might be overthrown completely before Fahd dies. Growing fury against the U.S. threatens to topple the government, and might force the royals to turn on us just to save their own skins.

So any way you look at it, skyrocketing oil is right around the corner...

The fall of the House of Saud: how to profit

When oil takes off, our economy will crater.

As I explained earlier, the price of oil affects almost everything else in our economy. When the price of oil soars, prices for everything else will explode. Massive, instant inflation, across our entire economy.

Many, probably most "conventional" investments will be sledgehammered. But the investments I've been recommending in this newsletter (precious metals, rare coins) will soar.

Yes, gold and silver have dipped since I recommended them in the last few issues. Doesn't matter: they're rockets on the launch pad, and the fuses are lit. Gold might fall as far as $340 in the short term, but don't be faked out—precious metals are going to blast off, and investors who don't get in now are going to kick themselves later. The recent dip has washed out the weak longs, and the long-term trend for both metals is up.

I'm standing firmly behind my gold and silver recommendations in the last 2 issues. The bullion and rare coin investments I told you about will be hot items when the oil firestorm hits.

Now let's talk about oil itself. Back in March, I told you that oil was going up. I couldn't be any MORE correct: NYMEX oil just set a new high in the entire history of the exchange, going back more than 20 years. And the trouble in the Middle East is just beginning...

For this issue, I have a new oil recommendation: Noble Corporation (ticker symbol NE), a drilling company with a long history behind it (they've been in business for 84 years). When the House of Saud goes down, oil companies will be frantically drilling for more supplies, and drillers like Noble will do very well. The company operates deep-water ships and semisubmersibles all over the world, and should be an excellent play on Middle Eastern oil troubles.

But what if I'm wrong?

What if everything I've said in this issue turns out to be incorrect?

Even if the House of Saud stays in power for another generation... even if Osama bin Laden doesn't follow through on his threats of jihad against the "unforgivable sins" of the corrupt royal family... even if somehow, against all odds, Saudi Arabia maintains a pro-U.S. policy for several decades... I think the price of oil is still going to blast off, for other reasons having nothing to do with Saudi Arabia.

I'll explain why in the next issue!
